planned and hurried forward on a grant scale. Two bills, one for a part of a road from the National road to the Gulf, and from the National road to the National road to the National road to the National road to the National road had been passed by Congress and single by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe and Adams; and Jackson, notwithstanding his vetoes of other bills, signed a bill for this road. Congress was regarded as simply a truste to use the money set adulting to the Union the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. The appropriation bills referred to this fund or use the form of the Northwert territory. Up to 1830 and the repart of the new and overshadowing system. Among the few that got a fair start before railroads overtook them, was the "National road," and although it is not the great highway its projectors expected, yet it is still a remarkable highway through hundreds of miles of its course, and with slight restorations might well serve as a model for what we now propose to do. It is a diana that it has been neglected in many places by those to whom Congress aurrendered its courtrol.

The plan for this highway was gradually formed. When Virginia, in 1781 and 1781, surrendered her territory beyond the Ohio, she stipulated for a road across the Alleghenies; and among the benefits obtained by the Ohio Company in the Ordinance of 1787 cstablishing the Northwest Territory, was a coning the Northwest Territory.

compacts. Action was delayed by the pressing matters claiming the government's attention, till 1806, when Congress ordered a turvey of the road as far as the Ohio. In 1811 a survey part way across Ohio was ordered. The war of 1812 delayed work, and in 1816 only sixty miles were completed beyond Cumberland, although such sections, as far as the Ohio, as presented the greatest obstacles were in tolerable shape, and President Monroe reported to Congress that the road could be finished in anything like the style of the Cumberland road. Work stopped altogether about 1850, when, in appear to the proposed, and the road was never finished in anything like the style of the Cumberland road work and President Monroe reported to Congress that the road could be finished in the condition of the proposed, and the road was never finished in anything like the style of the Cumberland road work and the complete the style of the Cumberland road work and the road was breat of the style of the Cumberland road work and the road was breat complete. The survey was next extended to the Mississippi and reached Jefferson City. Missouri, in 1827, The road reached Columbus in 1827, and was begun at Indianapolis in 1830. The frontier line receded faster than the road advanced, but the delays were not altogether time lost; for Macadam's system of road-making had been proved by England in the meantime, and we profited by her experiments. The road was all macadamized, and mostly with limestone, which, contrary to Macadam's fears, did not dissolve, except enough to cement itself.

From parts of the road still kept in good repair, we can form an idea of it in its prime. The whole roadway was sixty leet wide, macadamized to forty, and four teams can yet drive abreast over parts of it; but fresh stone has for many years put only twenty feet wide, and dirmers have set out their fences accordingly. Neither the prepared ground nor the broken stone was rolled, but the bed is now very firm from years of added stone. In nothing was this road more of a luxury to our grandf timers than in its numerous bridges in place of the froublesome and delay-causing fords. The bridges are of stone, except over some of the very largest streams, and have thirty feet roadways between the parapels. There are some fine creek bridges of two and three arches, and even very many of the culverts might be called bridges. Panels with inscriptions were placed on the finer bridges; but, like the mile-stones, they were of stones of triangular from pillars show the greater dignity and importance of the earlier road.

Virpinia and Pennsylvania had early been rivals as to a road across the Ailes sighenies. Washington, in 1784, marched by way of Winchester against the iffrench on the Obio. Then Fort Cumberland was built, and Braddock marched over the same route. He shought the northern route better, but did not succeed in getting Pennsylvania to make a road in time. The closeness with which the latter highway has followed the old army route, is shown by Braddock's grave, in a clump of ornamental trees, beside the National road. He was buried right in the old trait, the wagons under the ludians. The almost obliterated regarding over the grave to conceal it from the ludians. The almost obliterated regarding over the grave to conceal it from the final successful expedition against the road. But the road was delayed and the West was uneasy; for the government, was accused of trilling Great Britain about Indian affairs, and with Spain about the navigation of the Mississippi. There were grave doubts expressed as to the Republic's ability to retain control of the territories beyond the Alleghenies, and a road then would have played the part taken by the Pacific road in later years. In 1892, when Ohio was admitted to the Union, she urged the building of the road upon Congres, and agreed not to tax lands sold by the government for five years after the sale, 10 per cent of the prachase money to be given. in to the road.
